

Title: "It's Different for Guys": Gendered Narratives of Racial Conflict among White California

Youth

Author: Mary Bucholtz

Address:

Department of Linguistics

3607 South Hall

University of California

Santa Barbara, CA 93106-3100

USA

bucholtz@linguistics.ucsb.edu

phone: 805-893-3776

fax: 805-893-7769

Short title: Gendered Narratives of Racial Conflict

File size: 6,990 words, 115 KB

“It’s Different for Guys”:

Gendered Narratives of Racial Conflict among White California Youth <sup>1</sup>

Abstract

As race talk has gained attention throughout the social sciences, sociocultural linguistics has become increasingly important in revealing how racial ideologies and identities are discursively produced. This article examines how race talk among white youth reproduces racial binaries while simultaneously perpetuating gender ideologies. Drawing on European American teenagers’ narratives of conflict at an ethnoracially diverse and divided California high school, the analysis examines three discursive practices of racial reversal whereby white youth portray themselves as disadvantaged vis-à-vis their black peers: (1) claims of “reverse discrimination,” (2) narratives of racialized fear, and (3) fight stories. Whereas white girls’ narratives of discrimination and fear relied on racial vagueness, white boys’ narratives of physical conflict highlighted racial difference. These contrastive strategies indicate the different racial stakes for white girls versus white boys at the school. The article demonstrates the necessity of examining race talk not only for its content but also for its discursive structure, social and interactional context, and ideological effects.

Keywords: California, ethnography, gender, ideology, interaction, race talk, sociocultural linguistics, whiteness, youth

Introduction

Race talk, or discourse about race and ethnicity, is a key mechanism whereby the racial reasoning that upholds white privilege is propagated in everyday discourse. Previous studies show that a good deal of race talk hinges on generalized and usually negative statements about race and racialized categories—particularly when majority group members talk about minority groups (e.g., Bonilla-Silva 2003; van Dijk 1987; Wetherell and Potter 1992). These generalizations are often bolstered through narratives of specific incidents designed to illustrate or provide evidence for racial claims and complaints. Narratives lend rhetorical weight to racial generalizations by offering both the authenticity of personal experience, either the narrator's own or that of one or more other identifiable individuals, and the vividness of specificity, rendered via dramatically chosen details of place, time, participants, and unfolding events. As narrative analysts have long recognized, although a narrative is typically presented as an accurate account of a past event, it may or may not be grounded in truth, and even if it is, it may have been subject to considerable embellishment and editing. For analysts, then, the primary concern is not to confirm the accuracy of such narratives (which is generally difficult if not impossible to do) but to understand their interactional function as powerful tools for making and supporting claims.

As the broad interdisciplinary field of sociocultural linguistics (Bucholtz and Hall 2008) has increasingly engaged with questions of race, it has begun to make common cause with nonlinguistically oriented research on race talk. This scholarly convergence opens up new possibilities for dialogue across disciplinary boundaries, for sociocultural linguists have a great deal to learn from other researchers about the discursive constitution and reproduction of race. At the same time, researchers in other fields can benefit from the insights of sociocultural linguistic approaches to race. From a sociocultural linguistic perspective, nonlinguistic research on race talk generally has at least three limitations: it tends to focus exclusively on discourse content; it often treats language as a direct mirror of speaker psychology rather than a situated social production; and it typically overlooks the subtle discursive and interactional phenomena that help expose the workings of race and power. Moreover, both linguistic and nonlinguistic research on race talk that is not informed by ethnography runs the risk of treating racial processes in a monolithic and overdetermined fashion, thereby missing the ways that racial projects are locally specific, fragmented, and potentially unstable.

The sociocultural linguistic approach to race talk that I advocate here involves both discourse analysis and ethnography. Discourse analysis calls attention to the discursive and interactional structures that support race talk, while ethnography highlights local meanings of race and its intersections with other social parameters, such as gender. Analyzing how race talk is shaped by its sociocultural and interactional context reveals both the complexity and the variability of how race is discursively reproduced.

The following analysis investigates race talk among European American students at Bay City High School, a large, urban, multiracial high school in California's San Francisco Bay Area that had no racial majority; the two largest groups were African American and European American. During the period of my ethnographic fieldwork in 1995-1996, Bay City High School was widely viewed both by the local community and by students, teachers, and parents, as a "racially tense" school, with tensions particularly arising between African American and European American students. In ethnographic interviews with me as well as in discussions in classrooms and peer conversations in the schoolyard, white youth often claimed a position of racial disadvantage in relation to their black peers, despite clear material evidence that they enjoyed substantial economic, educational, and structural benefits that were unavailable to African American students.

In my larger ethnographic study (Bucholtz forthcoming), I examine how white teenagers linguistically managed their identities in this “majority minority” high school, both through the use of race talk and through the semiotic creation of racialized youth styles. While students of all stylistic orientations talked about their own whiteness in similar ways (see Bucholtz & Hall 2008), in teenagers’ discourse about racial difference, and especially blackness, differences emerged on the basis of gender as well as style. Race talk thus served as a resource for simultaneously positioning the speaker in relation to locally available racial, gender, and stylistic categories.

Race talk and whiteness at Bay City High

White teenagers’ talk about race at Bay City High School was characterized by a discourse of racial reversal, or the assertion of whites’ racial disadvantage vis-à-vis blacks. Racial reversal was manifested in three different forms: (1) expressions of white resentment of a perceived “reverse discrimination,” in which European American youth characterized themselves as oppressed by what they viewed as the institutional favoritism toward people of color both at Bay City High School and nationwide; (2) tales of racialized fear and white persecution, in which white teenagers described their perception of being in danger of violence, harassment, or criminal behavior from their black peers; and (3) interracial fight stories, or narratives of physical conflict between racialized groups, which ideologically constructed a gendered racial hierarchy of physical power in which African American males were ranked as superior to European American males. Through these three discourse practices, white youth depicted their racial situation at Bay City High as rife with resentment, fear, and racial subordination. While these perceptions were no doubt genuinely and deeply held, they did not capture the complex reality of race at the school and community, in which black students far more than whites confronted institutional obstacles to academic success and encountered personal threats to their physical well-being. Indeed, it appeared to me that the very real fear and frustration that European American teenagers reported in their stories about race derived not from any significant danger or discrimination that they faced but in large part from such racial narratives themselves, which were in heavy circulation among white students and powerfully shaped the discourse of race among European Americans at Bay City High School and in the larger community.

Racial resentment and the rhetoric of white disadvantage

While white students' negative racial discourse often emerged through narratives of specific incidents of interracial fear, racial complaints came up in other ways as well. This was especially true of the ideology of reverse discrimination, which rhetorically positioned whites as institutionally disadvantaged compared to people of color. Perhaps because it was difficult for white youth to point to specific examples of reverse discrimination that they or their peers had experienced at the school, this issue tended to be couched in more generalized statements of racial resentment. That is, although European American teenagers may not have been able to report many (or any) clearcut cases of reverse discrimination, they nonetheless presented themselves as its victims.

The ideology of reverse discrimination reconfigured the official racial discourse at Bay City High, which emphasized respect for ethnoracial difference and the celebration of multicultural diversity. This multicultural discourse heavily informed the school's curriculum, from specific units on race and ethnicity in required English and history classes to entire courses on ethnoracial themes, including the school's controversial Multiculturalism class. This course in particular was the cause of considerable grievance among European American students, many of whom felt that the class portrayed whites as racial oppressors and thus licensed students of color to treat their white peers with open hostility. In Example (1), Claire and Christine, both European American girls, express their scorn for the school's multicultural discourse of respect, and Claire goes on to suggest that the school's rhetoric is hypocritical given her own experience in the Multiculturalism class.

(1)

- 1 Claire: It's so like,
 2 Christine: <sniff>
 3 Claire: "We a:ll got to show each other respect."
 4 It's like,
 5 "Yeah well,
 6 you should be doing that [<sub>1</sub>anyway.<sub>1</sub>]
 7 Christine: [<sub>1</sub><sniff> <sub>1</sub>]
 8 Claire: We don't need to,
 9 make a big,
 10 deal: out of it.
 11 We shouldn't make [<sub>2</sub>people go and,<sub>2</sub>]"
 12 Christine: [<sub>2</sub>A big politi<sub>2</sub>]cal campai:gn,
 13 a[<sub>3</sub>bout giving people re<sub>3</sub>]spect,

- 14 Claire: [3I kno::w. 3]
- 15 Christine: it's [4like, 4]
- 16 Claire: [4It's like,4]
- 17 <whisper> {Multi[5culturalism,
- 18 oh mys] god,
- 19 Christine: [5“Why don't you just,
- 20 do it.”5]
- 21 Claire: Teach people how to hate white kids.
- 22 Mary: Oh yeah?
- 23 Claire: I'm really bitter about [6that class.6]
- 24 Mary: [6@@@ 6]

The girls' complaints about the school's discourse of multiculturalism are framed not as specific narratives that illustrate their grievances but as a series of typifications (Agha 2007) and assessments of a general state of affairs. Thus Claire introduces the quoted speech in line 3 with a structure that marks it as a general characterization (it's so like; line 1) rather than a quotation tied to a specific episode or speaker. This typifying utterance is in turn negatively assessed via quoted speech (lines 4-6, 8-11; 15 and 19-20). Similarly, in line 17, Claire introduces the topic of the Multiculturalism class without either characterizing it or offering an explicit assessment, although her whispered voice quality and use of the affective marker oh my god (line 18) point up the dramatic significance of this topic. She then provides a general characterization of the Multiculturalism class (Teach people how to hate white kids; line 21), followed by a negative assessment (I'm really bitter about that class; line 23).

Like many other white students at Bay City High, Claire and Christine view the explicitly multicultural discourse at the school as overblown (“We don’t need to, make a big, deal: out of it,” lines 8-10; A big political campaign, line 12), as more talk than action (“you should be doing that anyway,” line 6; “Why don’t you just, do it,” lines 19-20), and as coercive (we shouldn’t make people ... ; line 11). It appears to be this last issue that leads Claire to bring up the Multiculturalism class, which in her view exposes the school’s discourse of respect as both inappropriate and hypocritical. Claire’s sentiment regarding the course as a training ground for racism against European Americans (and especially the “white kids” at Bay City High; line 21) was shared by many European American teenagers. For example, one white girl, Erin, remarked during a class discussion of race that the Multiculturalism course “was hell for me,” although she did not provide any further details, and she reported that an African American boy in her class had referred to it as “Revenge 101.”

The complaints of reverse discrimination in my data, then, were not narratives of specific instances of institutional favoritism against white youth but general characterizations and typifications, offered with little detail and received with little comment. It appeared that because the discourse of white disadvantage was so firmly entrenched among many European American students, such assertions did not require explanation or supporting evidence. And even when I encouraged students to elaborate further, as in Example (1) above when I respond to Claire’s complaint about the Multiculturalism class with the question Oh yeah?, this yielded little in the way of detailed illustrations of claims of discrimination. Following the above example, for instance, Christine offers a lengthy story about a fight that broke out in her Multiculturalism class in which an African American girl was physically attacked by a boy of unspecified race, which Christine found terrifying but in which she was not herself a target of violence. Claire then goes on to complain that the class was not academically demanding enough and that she was able to trick the teacher into exempting her from doing any coursework for the entire semester.

Apparently such stories were more tellable than stories that illustrated the claim that the class promoted racial tensions. While I have no doubt that these girls and many other white students did indeed feel uncomfortable, even targeted, in Bay City High's classes on multicultural issues, specific instances of such moments are not reported in my data.

Narratives of racial fear

Like the European American discourse of reverse discrimination, which invoked a shared ideology of white disadvantage and hence did not require specific evidence or illustration, the rhetoric of racial fear, which was perhaps even more widespread among European American youth at the school, similarly positioned whites as subordinate to and oppressed by blacks. The discourse of fear relied on a racial ideology of white vulnerability to black violence that legitimated white students' perception that they were in physical peril (Armour 1997). Yet, as with the discourse of reverse discrimination, while I frequently spoke with European American (and sometimes middle-class Asian American) teenagers who expressed genuine fear of their African American peers, their talk about this anxiety was rarely grounded in specific instances of personal experience. Moreover, when specific stories of interracial conflict did occur, they were more often about perceived close calls and verbal confrontations rather than actual incidents of black-on-white violence.

In my data, the rhetoric of racial danger often interacts with the ideology of colorblindness, according to which talk about race is itself considered racist (Bucholtz forthcoming; Pollock 2005). Consequently, racial others are not always straightforwardly labeled as such in white students' discourse about race. Yet if blackness often goes unnamed in these narratives, whiteness is frequently mentioned, a reversal of the general European American perception of blackness as marked and hence nameable and whiteness as unmarked and hence unmentioned (cf. Trechter and Bucholtz 2001; Whitehead and Lerner 2009). At the same time, European American teenagers' narratives of a perceived racialized threat often assert the value of forming friendly acquaintanceships with African American youth as a means of protection from interracial conflict. Example (2) illustrates these characteristics of European American teenagers' narratives of racial fear. The example takes place during a portion of an ethnographic interview when I asked students about specific terms for groups and activities at the school. Here the term hip hop is under discussion. In response to a question from me about whether she knows people in the "hip hop crowd," Christine, who is in her third year of high school, links the term to her own past experiences of being harassed by black students as a first-year student, or freshman.

(2)

- 1 Mary: So you don't,
 2 n-
 3 know people that,
 4 would be in something called a hip hop crowd,=
 5 =or you wouldn't [<sub>1</sub>use a term like that?<sub>1</sub>]
 6 Christine: <higher pitch> [<sub>1</sub>{Oh,
 7 I kno:w them.}<sub>1</sub>]
 8 I know,
 9 I know some people.
 10 (0.8)
 11 Which helps alleviate situations ↑so@me@times,
 12 B@ut,
 13 Mary: ↑Hm.
 14 Christine: they're not like my f:rie:n:ds.

15 Mary: What do you mea-
 16 it helps alleviate situations?
 17 Christine: Oh,
 18 I don't know.
 19 Like,
 20 I-
 21 I've,
 22 Not so much recently,
 23 but especially freshman year,
 24 I found that like I got picked on,
 25 because you know,
 26 I'm a li-
 27 <higher pitch> {small white girl.}
 28 Mary: [2Mm.2]
 29 Christine: [2And 2] it's like,
 30 sometimes,
 31 if I knew s-
 32 if I know somebody in the crowd,
 33 I'll be like,
 34 "Oh,
 35 ↑hi:!"
 36 Mary: [3Mm. 3]
 37 Christine: [3(And they'll—)3]
 38 You know,
 39 it'll be oka:y.=
 40 Mary: =[4Mm.4]
 39 Christine: =[4If I 4] know,
 41 <sniff>
 42 (0.5)
 43 If I know them they don't p@ick o@n ↑me@[5@@.5]
 44 Mary: [5Hm. 5]
 45 Christine: for @one thing.

Christine relies on referential vagueness in this example (e.g., them, lines 7, 43; some people, line 9) and does not need to explicitly name the racial category of blackness in order to be understood by me and her friend Claire. To begin with, although she does not racially identify the “hip hop crowd,” at Bay City High School this label generally indexed African American youth (or those who emulated their style). Moreover, Christine’s racialized description of herself as a “small white girl” (line 27) makes plain to her listeners that it is African Americans to whom she is referring with vague terms like they and somebody. This interpretation is based on two key details of the local ethnographic situation. First, because blacks and whites were the school’s two largest and—to white youth—most salient groups, for a white speaker to invoke whiteness usually implied the relevance of blackness. Second, because many European American students held ideologies that black-on-white aggression was commonplace at Bay City High, a European American teenager’s mention of specifically white victimization generally implied a black perpetrator unless stated otherwise. In this way Christine adheres to the discourse of colorblindness even as she signals to her audience the racial dimension of her talk.

Christine displays a similar reticence regarding the topic of racialized conflict itself. She herself raises the issue in discussing the “hip hop crowd,” but she again does so in vague terms (I know some people. (0.8) Which helps alleviate situations ↑so@me@times; lines 9-11).

Moreover, laughter tokens are embedded in the final part of her utterance; in the context of talk about troubles, laughter is often a display that the problem the speaker has brought up is not a serious concern, or at least that she has the situation under control (Jefferson 1984). Likewise, when I ask Christine to elaborate on this remark, she hedges repeatedly before doing so and emphasizes that the incidents in question mainly occurred two years earlier (lines 17-22). Nor is the narrative that she produces highly detailed. Instead, she uses generalization to typify rather than specify the situation she is reporting, and she continues to linguistically obscure the identity of her antagonists, in this case by using an agentless passive (I found that like I got picked o:n; line 24). But although Christine draws on a number of linguistic devices to downplay the difficulties she has experienced as a “small white girl,” in the middle of her discourse she abruptly switches from the generalized past to the generalized present, thus implying that the situation has not entirely abated (lines 31-35: if I knew s- if I know somebody in the crowd, I’ll be like, “Oh, ↑hi:!”).

Like Christine’s racial interpretation of hip hop crowd, in Example (3) below the phrase watch your back is similarly reinterpreted in (implicitly racialized) terms by two other European American girls, Zoe and Josie. Watch your back may be either a threatening warning or a positive expression used by students engaged in African American youth culture as part of a social code in which friends are expected to look out for one another—that is, to watch one another’s backs. These girls, however, took the phrase as quite literal advice to “watch your backpack.” This interpretation launched a series of narratives about thefts from backpacks that occurred as students moved through the school’s crowded hallways; Example (3) is the third in this series. The girls viewed such incidents as expectable rather than exceptional, but they also considered them significant criminal acts. As Josie asserted in initiating the narrative sequence, “There is organized crime at Bay City High”—by this she meant that two or more students sometimes collaborated to engage in petty theft. I have no evidence of such occurrences being commonplace, apart from often-retold stories by these and some other students. I myself never had anything stolen from my own backpack, despite my frequent failure to heed warnings from European American students and teachers about the perils of leaving my backpack unzipped or unattended.

(3)

- 1 Zoe: Also one time I was walking with my friends to math class,
2 and this guy,
3 like,
4 he was,
5 on m-
6 on my,
7 (1.0)
8 Anyways he was like on the right side I guess.
9 And so he started walking sort of like to the left.
10 Like sort of like pushing me over.
11 And I was like,
12 “Ah,”
13 you know?
14 Mary: Wow.
15 Zoe: Um-
16 an-17 and,
18 the—
19 like this guy that we were walking with,
20 like we know him and stuff?
21 And 'cause he kn:ew.
22 Like he realized that someone was behind us.
23 And he—

24 he said later,
 25 he was like,
 26 “Yeah I was afraid they were going to do something to me.”
 27 But I was totally oblivious.
 28 Mary: [1Mm. 1]
 29 Zoe: [1So like,1]
 30 I don’t know.
 31 I think it’s different for guys,
 32 also.
 33 [2A little more.2]
 34 Mary: [2Oh really? 2]
 35 In what sense?
 36 Zoe: It’s like,
 37 more intense for them,
 38 I guess.
 39 Mary: [3Hm. 3]
 40 Zoe: [3Because3] I mean he was so aware.
 41 Like he was just,
 42 like I [4was- 4]=
 43 Mary: [4Wow.4]=
 44 Zoe: =[5I was just5]=
 45 Mary: =[Why? 5]=
 46 Zoe: =[6walking to class, ]=
 47 Mary: =[6That- 6]=
 48 Zoe: =[7I was totally oblivious— 7]
 49 Mary: =[7that seems like it’s the opposite.7]
 50 Zoe: Yeah.
 51 Well like for w-

52 (1.0)
 53 Yeah.
 54 I don't know.
 55 For a white,
 56 guy.
 57 I don't know.
 58 I think so.

As in Example (2) above, Zoe's narrative uses referential vagueness to bring up an instance of racial danger without naming the racial other. Thus the supposedly threatening student is referred to only as this guy (line 2), remaining otherwise undescribed. It is only when Zoe—albeit with numerous hesitation markers—specifies the racial category of her friend (like for w- (1.0), Yeah. I don't know. For a white, guy; lines 51-56) at the very end of the discussion that race enters into the discourse. Yet for all participants race is salient from the very beginning of the series of narratives, given the topic of danger and theft that unites these stories and the white ideology of black students as the source of such perils.

As with many of the narratives of racial danger that I heard from European American teenagers, no overt threat ever emerges in Zoe's story; what constructs the episode as dangerous is the white participants' evaluation that it was. These evaluations occur via quoted thought and speech, which help recreate the emotion experienced in the narrated moment. Zoe reports that when she realizes that another student is menacing her, she reacts in alarm (And I was like, "Ah"; lines 11-12), and she quotes her friend as saying, "Yeah I was afraid they were going to do something to me" (line 26). Yet the details she provides make it difficult to confirm the interpretation that she and her friend were in imminent danger. Given the overcrowding at Bay City High School, jostling in the hallways was a regular occurrence, as was being closely followed by other students, and thus another person's mere proximity could not be sufficient to establish criminal intent. To be sure, a few teenagers of any race or ethnicity might take advantage of this situation to grab a wallet out of an easily accessible backpack. Nevertheless, European American youth at Bay City High, especially when in close physical contact with their African American peers, tended to have a much stronger perception of danger than the facts generally seemed to warrant.

This perception was fostered by white teenagers' recounting of stories of racial danger, of which Zoe's narrative is one example. What made such stories tellable was the potential threat they narrated, and thus details that emphasized this threat were important to include. Indeed, in several places in Zoe's narrative, details are added that enhance the drama of the narrative but do not fully cohere. Is the "someone ... behind us" (line 22) the original purported aggressor or instead a second antagonist, as perhaps implied by Zoe's quoted speech of her friend? And given Zoe's own reported realization of a potential threat in lines 11 and 12, why does she later state that she "was totally oblivious" (line 48) and characterize herself, in contrast to her friend, as "just walking to class" unaware of any danger (lines 44, 46)? Whatever the resolution to these puzzles, it is clear that her reframing of the narrative from a shared experience of racial fear to one undergone only by her male friend allows her to introduce an important rhetorical point: "it's different for guys" (line 31). She develops this point by characterizing herself as unaware and her male friend as hyperaware of an impending danger from a (presumably) African American boy. When in response I express surprise, grounded in my own feminist perspective, that a male might be more attuned to potential physical danger than a female, Zoe specifies that it is particularly "for a white, guy" (lines 55-56) that such situations are so "intense" (line 37). Her narrative thus reproduces an ideology of not only racialized but also gendered fear of African American students among European American youth at Bay City High.

The notion that racial conflict was different for boys than for girls was not unusual at the school, and indeed, all of the stories I heard about actual interracial violence (as well as many stories of potential violence) were told by boys. In such narratives, ideologies of race once again intermingled with ideologies of gender, as white male narrators ranked themselves against boys of other races and ethnicities within a hierarchy of masculinity based on physical strength. In foregrounding physical power over the structural power that endows whiteness with its hegemony, such narratives once again performed a rhetorical reversal of the relative power of black and white youth at Bay City High School.

Ideologies of masculinity in narratives of interracial violence

Despite white teenagers' frequent expressions of fear of victimization by a black aggressor, physical fights and other forms of confrontation between Bay City High School's students were far more often intraracial than interracial (see also Shuman 1986). Indeed, it may have been precisely their rarity that made episodes of interracial conflict especially tellable. Such incidents did indeed occur, but they were by no means common. Girls' racial narratives, like those of Christine and Zoe above, focused on verbal confrontation or a vague sense of danger. By contrast, in some boys' narratives about race, actual violence figured far more centrally. In such narratives, the ideology that "it's different for boys" found ample illustration. This difference was due in part to many white boys' perception that they were open targets of black male violence. Moreover, for many boys, being able to fight was closely tied to an ideology of masculinity as physically powerful. That is, fighting was a way for them to secure a reputation as normatively masculine, while failing to fight or being ignominiously defeated by an opponent could raise questions about one's masculinity. Hence, male narrators' stories of physical conflict with boys from other racialized groups involved ideologies not only of race but also of gender.

Scholarship on hegemonic forms of masculinity has demonstrated that although the power of middle-class masculinity is institutionally secured and does not rely on physical strength, physicality continues to be one measure of masculine power (e.g., Connell 1995; Edley & Wetherell 1997; Kiesling 1997). Physical strength may be associated in particular with working-class styles of masculinity linked to manual labor rather than to the politically and economically dominant middle class (Connell 1995; Willis 1977). In addition, physical masculinity is also often racialized. One consequence of this process is the longstanding cultural ideology of black masculinity as hyperphysical and hyperviolent (Collins 2005; Ferguson 2000; Jackson 2006), which is grounded in white exploitation of black labor first through slavery and later through low-wage, physically demanding jobs. At the same time, a complementary ideology positions Asian masculinity as physically deficient due to complex political and economic factors in the immigrant history of the United States (Eng 2000; Espiritu 1997; Shek 2006). These ideologies participate in a dominant cultural system of gendered racial logic that upholds white masculinity as normative, even as it is positioned in some local contexts, especially among youth, as physically inferior to black masculinity (Staiger 2006).

European American boys at Bay City High School drew on these ideologies in their narratives of interracial conflict in order to construct themselves as occupying an intermediate, "ordinary" position within a racial hierarchy of masculinity (Sacks 1984). Their fight stories invoked this ideological hierarchy in several ways: through overt racial references; through physical descriptions of African American men and boys; and through evaluations of the relative physical prowess of males of different racialized groups. Due to space limitations, I focus here on the first of these practices (see Author forthcoming for a discussion of all three practices).

Racial labels

In sharp contrast to the reliance on colorblind discourse in most other race talk I recorded at Bay City High, which led to delayed, implied, or hedged references to race, boys' interracial fight stories introduced the race of the combatants early in the narrative, and they did so in a direct, on-record way, without hedging or disfluency. Given the ideological importance of the racial hierarchy of masculinity in such stories, it was crucial for the narrator to establish the race of the combatants right away in order to lay the groundwork for an account of any physical shortcomings that might be attributed to him based on the narrated events.

The examples in (4) are the openings of three different fight stories. Example (4a) is the beginning of a narrative about an African American student's attempt to steal from the narrator's backpack, a theme that is also found in the stories by Josie and Zoe discussed above. Example (4b) comes from a series of stories about interracial fights, and Example (4c) initiates a narrative that was offered as an illustration of how "real friends," as opposed to "so-called friends," provide support in difficult situations. The first two narrators, Brand One and Mr. Frisky, are white; Brand One is also Jewish. The third narrator, Nico Caen, self-identifies as Puerto Rican but due to his blond hair, blue eyes, and pale skin, he was often viewed as white at Bay City High. Although he did not consider himself white, I include his narrative here because his apparent whiteness is made relevant later in his story (not shown here).

(4a)

1 Brand One: two months ago this dude,

2           um,
 3           (1.5)
 4           <tongue click>
 5           I was walking up to uh,
 6           to,
 7           the bus stop,
 8           and he—
 9           and he was in my backpack right?
 10          this,
 11          this black dude was like six,
 12          maybe like fi:ve ten,
 13          he was big,
 14          he was a lot bigger than me,

(4b)

1 Mr. Frisky:   Tim was talking shit,
 2           and suddenly,
 3           it seemed,
 4           <higher pitch> {out of the woodwork,}
 5           once again,
 6           the uh,
 7           @
 8           you know,
 9           suddenly about fifty to,
 10          you know,
 11          sixty,
 12          bl:ack kids suddenly swarm after him.

(4c)

1 Nico Caen: Over in the Park,
 2 like,
 3 beginning of this year,
 4 we uh:,
 5 <[tj]>
 6 some little Asian fools tried to start,
 7 funk with me and my friend,
 8 just two of us,
 9 and like thirty of them,
 10 you know?

In each example, racial labels occur early in the narrative (4a, line 11: this black dude; 4b, lines 9-12: fifty to ... sixty, black kids; 4c, line 6: some little Asian fools). In Examples (4b) and (4c) such a label is used as the first mention of the antagonist. Nor is the production of racial labels marked by the same indicators of interactional trouble seen in the earlier examples. To be sure, some disfluency occurs in these examples, which may be due either to the use of race labels or to other factors. However, compared to the colorblind discourse analyzed previously, in which racial labels are elaborately avoided or delayed, here the labels themselves are produced relatively early and easily. By mentioning race, and mentioning it at the very beginning of their narratives, these speakers put their audience on notice that the story they are about to hear has a specifically racial meaning.

The topicalization of race in stories of violence is not specific to this ethnographic context but is a generally recognized characteristic of race talk. For example, Teun van Dijk (1987: 73) reports that “aggression, violence, menacing behavior, and fights” were by far the most common topic raised by white speakers in the Netherlands when discussing racial minorities. And beyond the practice of racial labeling itself, speakers use a broad range of rhetorical strategies to represent antagonists of other races within fight narratives. Such strategies are designed both to enhance listeners' interest in the narrative and to guide the audience to evaluate the story in the same way that the narrator does. In the present data, the point of all these stories is similar: to recount an exciting event, in which the narrator and/or a friend faced considerable physical danger from one or more adversaries of another race. In so doing, however, these boys also use various resources to present themselves as adequately masculine to face and pass this challenge either through physical prowess or other means.

To make a fight story tellable, narrators must establish that they (or the narrative's protagonist) faced a formidable opponent. Thus in Example (4a) Brand One highlights the size of his adversary: this black dude was like six, maybe like fi:ve ten, he was big, he was a lot bigger than me (lines 10-14). The other two boys foreground (and no doubt inflate) their opponents' superior numbers (Example 4b, lines 9-12: about fifty to, you know, sixty black kids suddenly swarm after him; Example 4c, lines 8-9: just two of us, and like thirty of them). In all three cases, mention of race occurs in close juxtaposition with mention of the antagonists' attributes. Again, such descriptions are typical of race talk more generally (and especially overtly racist discourse). Indeed, the putative physical threat represented by African American men is such a frequent trope of white racial discourse that it has been dubbed the "Big Black Man Syndrome" (Vogelman 1993), and the description of people of color in Example (4b) as "swarm[ing]" (line 12) and other imagery of vermin (out of the woodwork; line 4) is commonplace in xenophobic and racist diatribes (Santa Ana 2002).

These narratives draw on both racial and gender ideologies. For example, where narrators may attribute superior numbers to either African American or Asian American antagonists, they attribute superior size and strength only to the former group. This is illustrated in line 6 of Example (4c), where Nico Caen describes his opponents as little Asian fools (fools here does not impugn the intelligence of those to whom it refers but serves as a generic term like guys or dudes). Although the term little here may be less a reference to the physical size of Nico's adversaries and more a trivializing assessment of the level of threat they presented, it is unlikely that such a term would have been used if Nico had viewed them as physically imposing. Through these racial references to antagonists in stories of interracial conflict, narrators construct a racialized hierarchy of masculinities, with African Americans at the top and—for non-Asian American narrators—Asian Americans at the bottom (cf. Chun 2001).

As shown in the foregoing examples, at Bay City High School the white ideology of racial reversal was reproduced through gendered narratives of race-based discrimination, fear, and physical conflict. White teenagers' discourse strategies of racial reversal inverted the structural distribution of power between whiteness and blackness by claiming whiteness as a racial disadvantage. This strategy appeared to dismantle the conventional system of racialized inequality, but in fact it shored up this system by elevating African American teenagers to the apex of the racial order on the basis of perceived physical power but not political or economic power. White students' narratives of racial conflict often quite explicitly constructed racial hierarchies in which African American boys in particular were figured as admirably powerful yet alarmingly dangerous. These strategies reflected the students' embeddedness within larger American discourses of race, but they were also tied to these white teenagers' specific location in a region of the United States and in a particular high school in which they were not members of the racial majority.

Conclusion

There is no question that European American teenagers at Bay City High often experienced themselves as beleaguered and oppressed by African Americans at the school, despite the objective reality that it was white students and not their black peers who enjoyed considerable advantages due to their racial category. As a white researcher, I was no doubt perceived as sympathetic to the racial complaints and narratives I heard, and I could understand if not share the very real fears, resentments, and anxieties that European American youth confided to me, even as I noted discrepancies between their perceptions and my own observations of race and power at Bay City High. It would be both simplistic and unproductive to dismiss white students' statements as symptoms of individual racism or other moral failings, for these statements were entirely predictable consequences of the contemporary racial situation of the United States, in which, despite ongoing racial injustice, those with the greatest degree of racial privilege often experience themselves as disadvantaged. Widespread discourses of reverse discrimination and reverse racism made it almost inevitable that even these relatively liberal European American youth, living in the politically progressive San Francisco Bay Area, would take up such discourses in making sense of the local racial order of Bay City High School, which they negotiated every day.

Nor is it possible for researchers to stand apart from the racial systems we analyze. My own uncritical responses to students' narratives made me complicit in their racial discourses. My collusion in and co-construction of race talk in these ethnographic interviews points to the importance of examining the subjectivity of the researcher as well as participants in studies of racial identity.

To get at the complex issues that arise in race talk, researchers require the broad, interdisciplinary approach of sociocultural linguistics, which allows for the examination of discourse content (an issue set aside by most traditional sociolinguists) as well as the details of linguistic and discursive structure. In addition, the sort of sociocultural linguistic analysis I advocate here enables consideration of context at multiple levels: the immediate level of the social interaction, the local level of the ethnographic situation, and the broader social, cultural, and political level that informs and is shaped by each instance of race talk. It is only by combining all these tools and perspectives, in dialogue with researchers offering complementary approaches, that the intricacies of race talk can be exposed and interrogated.

References

- Agha, Asif. 2007. Language and Social Relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Armour, Jody David. 1997. Negrophobia and Reasonable Racism: The Hidden Costs of Being Black in America. New York: New York University Press.
- Author. Forthcoming. White Kids: Language, Race, and Styles of Youth Identity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bonilla-Silva, Eduardo. 2003. Racism without Racists: Color-Blind Racism and the Persistence of Racial Inequality in the United States. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Bucholtz, Mary & Kira Hall. 2008. All of the above: New coalitions in sociocultural linguistics. Journal of Sociolinguistics 12(4): 401–431.

- Chun, Elaine W. 2001. The construction of white, black, and Korean American identities through African American Vernacular English. Journal of Linguistic Anthropology 11(1): 52–64.
- Collins, Patricia Hill. 2005. Black Sexual Politics: African Americans, Gender, and the New Racism. New York: Routledge.
- Connell, R. W. 1995. Masculinities. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Edley, Nigel & Margaret Wetherell. 1997. Jockeying for position: The construction of masculine identities. Discourse and Society 8(2): 203–217.
- Eng, David L. 2000. Racial Castration: Managing Masculinity in Asian America. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Espiritu, Yen Le. 1997. Asian American Women and Men: Labor, Laws, and Love. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Ferguson, Ann Arnett. 2000. Bad Boys: Public Schools in the Making of Black Masculinity. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Jackson, Ronald L., II. 2006. Scripting the Black Masculine Body: Identity, Discourse, and Racial Politics in Popular Media. Albany: SUNY Press.
- Jefferson, Gail. 1984. On stepwise transition from talk about a trouble to inappropriately next-positioned matters. In J. Maxwell Atkinson & John Heritage (Eds.), Structures of Social Action: Studies in Conversatio Analysis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 191–222.
- Kiesling, Scott. 1997. Power and the language of men. In Sally Johnson & Ulrike Hanna Meinhof (Eds.), Language and Masculinity. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 65–85.
- Pollock, Mica. 2005. Colormute: Race Talk Dilemmas in an American School. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

- Sacks, Harvey. 1984. On doing “being ordinary.” In J. Maxwell Atkinson & John Heritage (Eds.), Structures of Social Action: Studies in Conversation Analysis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 413–429.
- Santa Ana, Otto. 2002. Brown Tide Rising: Metaphors of Latinos in Contemporary American Public Discourse. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Shek, Yen Ling. 2006. Asian American masculinity: A review of the literature. Journal of Men’s Studies 14(3): 379–391.
- Shuman, Amy. 1986. Storytelling Rights: The Uses of Oral and Written Texts by Urban Adolescents. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Staiger, Annegret. 2006. Learning Difference: Race and Schooling in the Multiracial Metropolis. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Trechter, Sara & Mary Bucholtz. 2001. White noise: Bringing language into whiteness studies. Journal of Linguistic Anthropology 11(1): 3–21.
- van Dijk, Teun A. 1987. Communicating Racism: Ethnic Prejudice in Thought and Talk. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.
- Vogelman, Lawrence. 1993. The Big Black Man Syndrome: The Rodney King trial and the use of racial stereotypes in the courtroom. Fordham Urban Law Journal 20: 571–580.
- Wetherell, Margaret & Jonathan Potter. 1992. Mapping the Language of Racism: Discourse and the Legitimation of Exploitation. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Whitehead, Kevin A., & Gene H. Lerner (2009). When are persons “white”? On some practical asymmetries of racial reference in talk-in-interaction. Discourse and Society 20(5): 613–641.

Willis, Paul. 1977. Learning to Labor: How Working Class Kids Get Working Class Jobs. New York: Columbia University Press.

Notes

<sup>1</sup> My thanks to audiences at the American Anthropological Association annual meeting in Philadelphia, the first Vox California conference at the University of California, Santa Barbara, and the second Dialogic Language Use conference at the University of Helsinki for their feedback on various versions of this article. I am also grateful to Brendan Barnwell and Mackenzie Chapman for transcription assistance. Some of the material presented here also appears in Bucholtz (forthcoming).